Fall Hunt Test Volunteer Opportunities

Volunteer Opportunities:

2019 Fall Hunt Test August 24-25, 2019

PSLRA is hosting a JH, SH and MH test the weekend of August 24-25, 2019. Volunteering is an excellent way to see what hunt tests are all about while also supporting your club. If you are new to the field and hunt tests, there will be people to help you and provide instructions. Volunteers help the club manage its costs and keep events running smoothly.

Some of the various volunteer needs are typically:

1. Marshals
2. Stake Chairs
3. Volunteers to work with the stake chairs to help set up and take down equipment
4. Workers to operate the Pop and Throw stations
5. Gunners (contact the Gun Captain to see if you meet qualifications for this)
6. Hospitality (gathering and delivering lunches)
7. Test Dogs

Marshal: The marshal is responsible for keeping his/her assigned hunt test stake running promptly and smoothly, which includes, but is not limited to, the following tasks:

- The marshal is expected to maintain contact with headquarters, the head marshal (if one has been assigned), the hunt test chairman, and other stakes during the test – as needed. This is generally done via walkie-talkie.
- The marshal is responsible for the judges books and the marshal box. These can be picked up at headquarters (close to the main entrance of the grounds) in the morning. The judges books should be given to the judges prior to the test. Included in the marshal box are the catalogs, which should be distributed to hunt test participants.
- The marshal is responsible for checking people in (will be provided a list of dogs and handlers) and maintaining the running order. Marshals must make sure the holding blinds are full and may have to contact other stakes to find handlers who are running in multiple stakes.
- The marshal is responsible for reading out the list of callbacks, which they will receive from the judges. They are also responsible for providing the list of passing dogs (received from judges) to the Test Secretary at headquarters.
- Marshals are also responsible for making sure all of the workers and judges in their stake are provided food and drinks as needed (generally the hospitality volunteer will contact the marshal via radio and ask for a lunch count). There are usually coolers of drinks and snacks provided to each stake – the marshal makes sure all of the workers have a cooler.

Stake Chair: A hunt test stake chair is a volunteer who is responsible for keeping his/her assigned hunt test stake running promptly and smoothly, which includes, but is not limited to, the following tasks:

Fall Hunt Test Opportunities

- The stake chair usually meets with the judges the day prior to the test for determining proper set up of equipment, and set up the test equipment according to the judges' instructions.
- The stake chair ensures that the bird technicians and gunners have adequate hearing protection, popper shells, ammunition, etc. These items will generally be in the stake chair box, which will be provided to the stake chair.
- Once the test is finished, the stake chair ensures all test equipment is broken down, gathered, and returned to headquarters.

Pop and Throw Stations: Volunteers working in the pop and throw stations will either operate the wingers or be placing birds in a particular spot for blind retrieves. These volunteers may also be shooting blanks from a popper gun. No live birds are used in pop and throw stations. A winger is a device used to launch bumpers or birds using slingshot, or catapult mechanisms. The pop results from the sound of a blank powder cartridge. Training and instructions will be provided.

Test Dog: A dog of similar ability as the test participants at a particular level (Junior, Senior or Master) who isn't entered in the test. The test dog is used to show where the marks will be and that the test is set up to the standard ability level .

Volunteers are generally needed for a particular stake (Junior, Senior, Master) and you will generally stay with that stake until the test for that stake is over. That said, Master is a two day test and if you can only work one day, let the test chair know. Partial days can be accommodated.

If you are interested in volunteering at the Spring Test, contact the hunt tests chairs (or gun captain if you can shoot):

Structure of a Labrador Retriever

by Janis I Grannemann (reprinted with permission)

Since we talked about the standard, let's talk about why the Labrador is built like he is.

Labradors are different from other sporting dogs. They do not look like them nor do they move like them. They do not fly around the ring with tremendous reach and drive. They do not have flowing hair trailing after them or heads held high. When they stand, their topline is not sloping down gracefully to a beautifully held banner of a tail. Even other sporting dogs with short coats, move and stand with their heads high like the others, but not the Labrador. The Labrador moves powerfully and with purpose. There is no wasted motion. His head is held proudly, but it is more out in front than high in the air. His tail, if you can catch it, comes right off his croup. It is not a flag to be waved. It is more like a tool to be used. He is a slightly off-square solid dog with a level topline. He is a workman.

Do you know why he is built differently from the other sporting dogs? It is because the lab was originally bred as a water dog, not a land dog. He did not spend his days flying over the countryside looking for birds. His original purpose was to retrieve fish that had escaped the net, to retrieve items that had fallen off boats, to help pull in nets, and take things from one boat to another. All of his work was done in the water, so he had to be built differently from the land dogs.

The cod fishermen needed a medium-sized dog that would not take up too much space in the boat. The fishermen wanted as much room on the boat as possible for the fish. They wanted a dog with a short water-shedding coat so that when the dog returned to the boat from the sea he brought as little water as possible with him. This coat also had to protect the dog from the cold waters of the far north seas. They needed a biddable dog that would do what they asked of it and one that could work all day. If the fish were running, the fishermen were fishing. The dog also had to have a soft mouth. A fish that was torn up did not sell.

As a water dog, he needs to be built something like a boat. A boat 1) floats, 2) is fairly stable in the water, 3) moves through the water, and 4) if it is built correctly, it does not take too much energy to get it moving and keep it moving. I think that a Labrador is much like a rowboat. He is definitely not like a barge. A barge with its big flat front may fill the first three requirements, but certainly not the last. It takes lots of energy to get it to move and to keep it moving.

How can you compare a Labrador to the above picture? His sternum can be likened to the prow of the boat. Both cut through the water. His chest and shoulders would be the area behind the prow and his ribs would be the widest part of the boat. His rear is the back or stern of the boat. A boat that is fairly wide relative to its length will be very stable and one with a squared-off stern will have less drag. Notice that the stern of the boat is as wide or wider than the front of the boat. This also cuts down on drag and improves the water flow around the boat.

Now that we have the shape of our Labrador, we need to talk about balance. Most dogs have their center of gravity in their shoulder area with their front carrying most of their weight. If you put most of the weight in the front of a boat, your boat would take a nose dive to the deep. The same holds true for the Labrador. A boat should have the weight evenly distributed over the boat with the most weight being toward the middle. In his book, "The Dog In Action," McDowell Lyon says we need to move the center of gravity for a swimming dog toward the center of the dog. This is even more important when the dog is carrying a heavy weight like a fish or a bird in his mouth.

The placement of a dog's center of gravity depends on many things including leg length, body height, and length and weight of the head and neck. Thus we can move the center of gravity back by several means - 1) making the head smaller; 2) shortening the neck; 3) making the rear end heavier than the front, and 4) the presence of a mass in the loin area. The Labrador uses all of these things. He does not have a heavy head like a Mastiff or a Rottweiler. That would throw the balance off and down goes the boat. His head is of medium size and shape without sharp angles or exaggerations. It is clean.

Labrador retriever - head - hand-drawn illustration 8725511

The head has parallel plains with a moderate stop and chiseling under the eyes that makes for a rather aerodynamic head. I can see this type of head cutting through a wave in the northern seas. The lack of cheekiness makes the head even more aerodynamic. When the dog is swimming, water passes on either side of his muzzle. If he has fleshy cheeks, the water would build up in front of the cheeks and go up into the dog's eyes making it harder to see. A shorter muzzle would not be a good thing either as it makes it harder to pick up large objects and the dog would have to put more pressure on the object to hold it. More pressure could lead to damaging the object.

Our standard does not talk about the shape of the eye. It talks about expression, placement, color, and size, but not shape. That is because the shape of the eye is determined by the placements of the bones. If the head shape is correct the eye shape will be correct

Lastly, a comment about the ears. Their shape, size, and placement take into consideration that this is a water dog. The ears are set rather far back so they do not get in the way when the dog is carrying items or swimming. The placement of the ear rather low on the skull, but slightly above eye level does several things. It keeps the opening of the ear above the water level while swimming and it keeps the ear closer to the body for warmth and protection. If the ear was on top of the head or standing upright it would be more likely to freeze or be injured.

The neck must also be in balance with the whole dog. If the neck is too short or too long, it brings the center of gravity forward where it should not be in a swimming dog. It also makes it harder for the dog to pick up things from the ground. If a dog has the proper medium length of neck, he can make the retrieve on the run without having to stop. He just scoops it off the ground and is on the way back. A dog without the proper length of neck and straight shoulders must stop to pick up the bird or he will take a tumble. That is why many dogs in the field run past the bird and then come back for it at a slower pace.

From the Cairn Terrier Breed Presentation

The Labrador's body brings us back to the rowboat. The body should be short-coupled with a good spring of ribs, have a level topline and little or no tuck-up. Good spring of ribs not only gives room for the heart and lungs, but it also helps with buoyancy and stability. The ribs should be more egg-shaped than barrel-shaped. A barrel would be very hard to guide in any direction and would have a tendency to roll all the time. The egg shape with its keel (sternum in our Labradors) has more stability and is easy to guide.

McDowell Lyon also stated that as a water dog, the Labrador needed a strong core. A strong core requires a short loin and little or no tuck-up. The lack of tuck-up is the fourth way to move the center of gravity toward the rear of the dog. It also helps not only in reducing drag, but it helps with buoyancy, mobility, and the dog would expend less energy while swimming.

The water dog's legs and feet are the oars of the boat. They supply the power and should be under the body, not in front of or behind it. Not only does moving the legs forward or backward change many angles in the body, but think how hard it would be to row a boat if you were not sitting in the boat.

A waterdog needs balance, bone, and muscle to propel him through the water, not flash and speed on the ground. Tremendous reach and drive would be wasted motion in the water. It would waste energy and slow him down. So, a water dog on land moves with purpose and power, not flash and show. He does not waste energy. Maybe he moves something like our Labradors.
